Components of a go-to-market strategy

A go-to-market strategy defines three priorities. These make up the pillars of your approach to sales.

Sales Planning

Where to sell

Territories, quotas, account segments, and sales capacities are the building blocks of your sales plan.

Anaplan gives you the power to model all of these in advance, and then to optimize them using iterative feedback.

With Anaplan, you can set an ideal quota for every rep, get more value from your territories, and perfect your sales coverage, all from a single platform.

Sales Incentives

How to sell

Incentives motivate the right behaviors to ensure that your sellers' advance your larger corporate strategy.

The Anaplan platform provides full visibility to the whole organization, giving salespeople, managers, sales leaders, and executives real-time information on sales performance.

Rapid calculations keep payments timely and accurate. Advanced modeling capabilities let you test new incentives and evaluate their effectiveness before rolling them out to the field.

Sales Insights

What to sell

To make decisions that chart the future of your organization, you need accurate, actionable data.

Anaplan gathers and analyzes real-time information from across the sales organization and delivers it in dashboards configured for each stakeholder. You can create accurate, reliable sales forecasts, optimize pricing, and use pipeline metrics to keep your business healthy.

Your sales strategy: It's all connected

A go-to-market strategy is more than a collection of individual parts. It's a single organism, evolving as a unit. This is why it should be managed on a single platform that lets you oversee each component, while also keeping you attuned to the whole.

Small changes to your sales plan can ripple across the entire go-to-market strategy.

“Driving top-line growth and optimizing the sales force: that’s what we do. Anaplan gets us there.”
